

A TENTATIVE CODIFICATION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT LAWS.

The Old Testament laws in their present form are a confusing labyrinth in which the modern reader who dares to enter is quickly lost. Civil, criminal, constitutional, humane and ceremonial regulations are mingled together with only an occasional attempt at systematic classification. Primitive and very late laws are also grouped together without distinction, so that it is almost impossible to trace the historical development of a given institution. The inevitable result is that this large and exceedingly important legal literature is practically a terra incognita to most students of law and religion.

The prevailing confusion is primarily due to the fact that these laws come from the East, where systematic arrangement is the exception rather than the rule. The successive re-editing of the Old Testament books in which they are found has also increased the disorder. It is perfectly obvious, therefore, that before the Old Testament laws can be intelligently read and utilized by modern western readers, they must be systematically codified, (1) logically, according to subject matter, and (2) chronologically, within each group, so that the enactments and usages of successive periods can be studied in their true historical order.

The work of logical, scientific classification is here especially difficult, since the Old Testament laws in their origin, character and aims, are fundamentally different from the codes with which we are to-day familiar. In many cases the Israelitish laws do not fit into any of the modern systems of codification, all of which are derived from Roman sources. The peculiar genius and content of the Old Testament codes must ever be regarded; and where, as in Exodus 21:1 to 22:20 and in certain parts of Deuteronomy a general principle of classification is discernible, it should be followed. At the same time, modern accepted canons of classification must, as far as possible, be adopted if the best practical results are to be achieved.

Fortunately the scientific Biblical scholarship of the past century has definitely distinguished the four or five great original codes that underlie the Old Testament legislation and has determined the approximate date of each. While the decisions which Moses rendered and the principles that he promulgated establish forever his position as the father of Israelitish law, the evidence is conclusive that the different codes gradually grew as new needs and new institutions developed in the life of the Hebrew nation. The theory which attributed all Israelitish laws to one man and generation first originated with the later Jewish scribes; but unfortunately it was generally accepted by the Christian Church, and for centuries has tended to conceal the true character and historical relations of the different Old Testament codes.

The oldest laws, found in Exodus 20:22 to 23:19, bear on their face the evidence of their antiquity. They assume as their basis a primitive nomadic and agricultural life and the simplest family and tribal organization. While they were probably not committed to writing before the ninth or eighth centuries before Christ, they include many customary laws, which doubtless go back to the time of Moses and even earlier. They therefore represent the development of Israel's civil, humane and religious institutions between 1200 and 800 B. C., and may be appropriately designated as the Primitive Codes.

The law book brought forth by the counsellors of King Josiah and by him made the basis of the sweeping reformation instituted in 612 B. C. constitutes the basis of the book of Deuteronomy. This legal book includes many laws found in the primitive codes of Exodus 20 to 23; some of these earlier enactments it also modifies or reverses. The original law book of Josiah has also been supplemented by other regulations; but the laws found in Deuteronomy, as a whole, evidently represent the growth of Israel's legal institutions between 800 and 600 B. C. In part contemporary with the Deuteronomic codes are a group of laws found in Leviticus 17 to 26. Some of them are evidently very old; many of them were known to Ezekiel, who wrote between 592 and 572 B. C.; most of them appear to have been committed to writing early in the Babylonian exile. Since they constantly emphasize the obligation of Jehovah's people to be holy in act and ceremonial, the collection as a whole is known as the Holiness Code.

The destruction of the temple at Jerusalem in 586 B. C. and the transportation of many of the Jewish priests to Babylonia gave them the leisure and a powerful incentive to edit and expand their laws and above all to record in permanent literary form the customary usages and ceremonial institutions that had grown up about the pre-exile sanctuary. The priestly editors also improved the opportunity to correct defects in the older system and still further to expand the ritual that it might meet the demands of the changed situation. Ezekiel's code in chapters 40 to 48 of his prophecy illustrates this tendency. It proposes a new program for the restored Jewish community; and yet it is based on earlier ceremonial customs. Many other priests in the leisure of the exile devoted themselves to collecting and codifying older laws and formulating new ones. The ritual commanded their chief attention. The results of their labors are preserved in parts of Exodus, Leviticus and Numbers; the groups of laws that thus grew up between 600 and 400 B. C. are known as the Priestly Codes.

At the request of the editors of the YALE LAW JOURNAL the following tentative codification of the Old Testament laws is submitted for criticism and suggestion. The classification, when revised, will be made the basis of the fourth volume of my Student's Old Testament, which will include a new translation of the laws, with introductions and notes.
