"If sound waves carry on to infinity, where are their screams now?"¹ sound as close as my ears and upon the side of the green hill a lace of seagulls unravelling its own pattern and then no birds

just shadows of birds

small thoughts
black thoughts that woman and her child will die in the next war a new law means we take it seriously and they still die. . .

and of luck?
the black sky laughs and asks what possible exceptions could you have to the moon?
right and wrong

behind the veil of the sky listening to the argument of six moral philosophers standing on a pin and my sound-filled body is the point of access falling it rings out heavy as a rock in this avalanche

as before the cliffs black foam rises uncertainly towards the dust in my head

¹ MTC Cronin is a poet from Australia. She has published two books of poetry in Australia and one book of poetry in the United States.
1. ANNE MICHAELS, FUGITIVE PIECES (1997).